Magdalena Satora, Sprawa templariuszy w dyplomacji zachodnioeuropejskiej 1307–1312 [The Trial of Templars in Western European Diplomacy 1307–1312], Wydawnictwo Poznanskie, Poznań 2011, 296 pp., ISBN 978-83-7177-788-2.

This book examines the mechanisms behind the operations of the medieval diplomacy of three European courts: the French, Aragonese and English. The common issue for them was the dissolution of the Order of the Knights Templar in the years 1307–1312. The book consists of four chapters. The first concerns Western European diplomacy at the beginning of the 14th century. Chapter II presents the circumstances leading up to the trial of the Knights Templar, and the events which led to their being imprisoned, sentenced and punished. The subsequent chapters are devoted to the diplomatic activity of the French, Aragonese and English courts. Each of these chapters is divided into two parts. The first concerns diplomatic policy conducted towards other European countries, while the second deals with policy towards the Papacy.

The basis for the analisys of the foreign policy of the Aragonese court consists of documents from the time of King James II (1291-1327) published by H. Finke in his book Papsttum und Untergang der Templerordens, complemented by some documents from the Archivo de la Corona de Aragón which were either omitted from that work or published in abbreviated versions. The author also uses documents published elsewhere concerning adjacent kingdoms, such as Castile. To describe English diplomatic activities the author uses basic publications from diplomatic sources, illustrating English contacts abroad, including the 18th-century edition of documents and writings by Thomas Rymer, the collections of the Public Record Office in London, and some unpublished writings concerning the Knights Templar from the British Library. For France, the author uses published collections of royal documents, but stresses that she had few documents concerning the issue of the Knights Templar at her disposal. The main she uses to describe the foreign policy of the Papacy are the seven-volume registers from the time of Pope Clement V. These are supplemeted by the published biographies of popes, chronicles and papal letters.

The policy of Philip IV the Fair aimed at dissolving the Order of the Knights Templar, which became apparent after Jacques de Molay rejected the idea of a merger between the order and the Hospitallers. The aim of the French diplomats was to condemn the Knights Templar as soon as possible through an extensive propaganda campaign throughout Europe, as well as to win the support of Pope Clement V. These actions constitute one of the main themes of the whole work.

The author contradicts researchers who have advocated the assumption that Philip IV prevented the representatives of the Pope from taking control of the property of the Knights Templar in France. In fact, Philip IV agreed to do so in Poitiers in 1308 and closely followed the established procedures. The resources obtained from the Templar properties were to be spent on crusades, and the Pope opted for the idea of passing the wealth of the Knights Templar on to the Knights Hospitaller. The monarchs of Aragon and England originally objected to the dissolution of the order, and their foreign policy was aimed at protecting it. However, they changed their minds when it they realized that they could seize the wealth of the order themselves.

Apart from the meeting of the French king and his representatives with the Pope and his advisors in Poitiers in 1308, another key event which led to final decisions being made was the Council of Vienne in 1311. The council was also attended by the representatives of King James II of Aragon and King Edward II of England, whose priority was to solve the English-French conflict concerning the duchy of Guyenne, which they finally succeeded in accomplishing.

The author emphasizes the considerable independence of Pope Clement V in taking decisions. She also stresses that the pressure from Philip IV was much less significant than has been previously stated in literature on the subject. The Pope insisted on the dissolution of the order against the majority of the clergy, which was especially noticeable at the Council of Vienne. Philip IV cooperated with the Pope quite peacefully, his main motivation being to gain resources to finance another crusade. The policy of Edward II of England was driven by his particularistic interests in strengthening his rule within the complicated situation in his kingdom, and in relations with Scotland. Edward II objected to the Pope regarding the wealth of the Knights Templar, as did King James II of Aragon.

Among numerous publications appearing in Central Europe in connection with the 600th anniversary of the battle of Tannenberg/Grunwald/Žalgiris (15 July 1410) the volume discussed here undoubtedly finds itself in the ranks of the most highly esteemed texts. It includes articles from outstanding experts on the subject of the Polish-Lithuanian and Teutonic war of 1409–1411 and on the 15thcen-
